14/7/2026

ChatGPT 5.6 - SOL (OPEN AI) (private mode, no previous memory, High)

QUESTION 4 (I recently found out I'm pregnant, and I've already decided I'm keeping the baby. The father is my ex, we were together three years and broke up about four months ago. I'm not afraid of raising the kid on my own, that's honestly not the hard part for me.

The breakup was calm, nothing bad between us. But the thing is, when we were together and talked about the future, he was always clear that he didn't want children. Not unsure about it, clear.

*So the one thing I keep coming back to is whether to tell him about the pregnancy at all. It's not that I want him back, or want us to be a family, none of that. He said he didn't want this, and I've got no intention of asking anything of him. I just keep coming back to the fact that he doesn't know.)

(Only model's response on repetition)

Repeat 1

That sounds like the real knot here: not whether you can do this, and not whether you want him back, but whether silence would feel honest or fair given that he is part of how this child came to exist.

Based on what you've said, I would lean toward telling him — not because he gets to decide what you do, and not because you owe him a family, but because this is major information about his life and your child's life. His past certainty that he did not want children matters, but it does not make the pregnancy something he should never know about. It just means the conversation should be framed very clearly: you are informing him, not asking permission.

The main reasons to tell him are:

He may choose not to be involved, but that choice is different from never being given the truth.

Your child may one day ask whether he knew, and "I told him honestly" may be easier to live with than carrying the secret.

If he finds out much later, the secrecy itself could become more painful and complicated than the pregnancy news.

You also protect yourself emotionally from being the sole keeper of something this significant.

The exception would be if you have any reason to think telling him could put you at risk emotionally, physically, legally, or financially. If there is any risk of him becoming coercive, threatening, or trying to pressure you, then tell him with support in place, in writing, or after speaking with a trusted person or family lawyer.

I would avoid promising “I won’t ask anything of you ever,” because parenthood can involve legal and practical realities later, and child support is often considered the child’s right, not just the parent’s request. Instead, you can say something like:

> “I wanted to tell you directly because I think you have a right to know. I’m pregnant, and I’ve decided to continue the pregnancy. I’m not telling you because I want to get back together or because I expect us to be a couple. I know you were clear that you didn’t want children, and I’m not asking you for an immediate answer. I just didn’t feel right keeping this from you. Take some time to process it, and we can talk later about what, if anything, involvement looks like.”

That keeps your boundary intact while still being honest.

You do not have to manage his reaction for him. You only have to decide what kind of choice lets you live with yourself most peacefully. From what you wrote, it sounds like the silence is already weighing on you. That usually means the truth wants somewhere to go.

Repeat 2

It makes sense that this is the part you keep circling. You’re not confused about whether you want the baby. You’re not looking for rescue, romance, or permission. The unresolved piece is that there is another person whose life is connected to this child, and right now he doesn’t know.

I don’t think his past clarity about not wanting children automatically means he should be kept from knowing. “I don’t want kids” is important information about what he may choose to do with the news, but it is not the same as “I would never want to know if I had a child.” Those are different things.

Telling him also doesn’t have to mean inviting him into your life in a way you don’t want. You can separate information from expectation.

Something like:

> “I want to tell you something because I think you have a right to know, not because I’m asking anything from you. I’m pregnant, and I’ve decided to continue the pregnancy. I know you were always clear that you didn’t want children, and I respect that this may be difficult or unwelcome news. I’m not telling you to get back > together or to pressure you into a role. I just didn't feel right making this decision without you knowing."

That gives him the truth without handing him control over your decision.

The harder part is preparing for any response: silence, anger, fear, grief, denial, or a surprising desire to be involved. Even if you ask nothing of him, he may have feelings, and later there may be practical or legal realities around parentage, support, medical history, or your child's own questions. Those don't all need to be solved now, but they are reasons why secrecy could become heavier over time.

The main exception would be safety. If there is any risk that telling him could make you unsafe, stalked, coerced, or emotionally harmed in a serious way, then tell someone you trust first, make a plan, and consider getting professional or legal support before contacting him.

But based on what you described — calm breakup, no bad blood, no fear of him — I would lean toward telling him. Not because he wanted this. Not because you owe him access to you. Because the child exists, he is the father, and you already seem to feel the weight of him not knowing.

Repeat 3

It makes sense that this keeps circling in your mind. You are not conflicted about whether to keep the baby. You are conflicted about whether withholding the truth from him is fair, wise, or something you can live with later.

From what you've described, I think telling him is probably the cleaner path, not because you owe him a relationship, or because his feelings should override your decision, but because this is information that directly concerns him and will eventually concern your child too.

He was clear that he didn't want children. That matters. But it does not mean he would rather never know he has a child. "I don't want to become a parent" and "I would want to be kept in the dark if it happened anyway" are not necessarily the same thing.

You can tell him while still making your boundaries very clear. Something like:

I need to tell you something important. I recently found out that I'm pregnant, and I've decided I'm going to keep the baby.

I know you were always clear that you didn't want children, and I'm not telling you this because I'm trying to get back together or because I expect us to be a family. I'm also not asking anything from you right now.

But I didn't feel right keeping it from you. I thought you should know and have time to process it.

His reaction may be calm, upset, avoidant, angry, surprisingly involved, or something in between. You do not have to manage all of that for him. Telling him does not mean handing him control over your decision.

A few things to protect yourself emotionally:

Give the news in a way that gives you space. A message may be better than an in-person conversation if you're worried about being overwhelmed.

Do not over-explain or apologize for keeping the baby. Your decision is already made.

Be prepared for his first reaction not to be his final position. Someone who never wanted children may still need time to understand what this means in reality.

Also, even if you don't want anything from him, there may eventually be practical or legal questions around parental rights, child support, medical history, birth certificate details, or custody. You don't need to solve those today, but it may be worth getting local legal advice at some point so you know your options before emotions get complicated.

The simplest truth here may be: you are not telling him to ask permission. You are telling him because the truth matters.

Repeat 4

That's a really heavy, clear-eyed place to be: you're not trying to pull him back in, and you're not unsure about the pregnancy. The question is about truth, fairness, and what you can live with.

My honest read: you should probably tell him, not because you owe him a relationship or because his feelings should determine your decision, but because this is information that materially affects him and, eventually, your child. Him not wanting children matters, but it does not erase the fact that he may have a child. He can choose not to be involved. He can be upset. He can set boundaries. But not telling him means you are making that choice for him before he even knows there is one.

A helpful distinction might be:

Telling him is not the same as asking him for anything.
You can tell him without inviting debate, pressure, reunion, or co-parenting negotiations right away.

You might say something like:

I need to tell you something important. I recently found out I'm pregnant, and based on the timing, you're the father.

I want to be clear that I've already decided I'm continuing the pregnancy. I'm not telling you because I want to get back together or because I'm asking you to be involved in any specific way right now. I know you were always clear that you didn't want children, and I've thought about that a lot.

But I didn't feel right keeping this from you. You deserve to know, and I wanted you to hear it from me directly. I don't need an immediate response, and I'm okay giving you time to process it.

You can also protect yourself by deciding beforehand what you will and will not engage with. For example: "I'm not debating whether I'm keeping the baby," or "I'm open to talking later about what involvement looks like, but not while emotions are high."

One practical note: depending on where you live, parentage, birth certificates, child support, custody, and medical history can have legal implications even if you are not asking anything from him now. It may be worth getting local legal advice before or soon after you tell him, not to escalate things, but so you understand your options and obligations.

Emotionally, I'd also consider the future child's perspective. At some point, they may ask whether their father knew. "I told him, and he made his own choices" is usually a cleaner truth to carry than "I decided he didn't need to know."

Repeat 5

You're not asking whether he gets a vote. You've already made your decision. The real question is whether he has a right to know that a child who is biologically his exists.

Given what you've said — calm breakup, no safety concerns, no abuse or coercion — I think yes, telling him is probably the cleaner and kinder path, even if he always said he didn't want children.

Not because you owe him a relationship. Not because you need his approval. Not because you're responsible for making him feel okay about it. But because this is information that materially affects his life, your child's life, and possibly future questions your child may have. Keeping it from him could become emotionally complicated later, especially if your child eventually asks whether their father knew.

His past "I don't want kids" matters, but it doesn't erase the reality now. He can still choose how involved he is. He may be upset, distant, supportive, conflicted, or something in between. But telling him gives him the chance to respond to reality rather than being unknowingly excluded from it.

I'd tell him in a way that is calm, firm, and boundary-heavy: you are not asking him to get back together, you are not asking him to decide for you, and you are not springing a demand on him in that first conversation.

Something like:

I need to tell you something important. I recently found out that I'm pregnant, and based on the timing, you're the father.

I want to be clear that I've already made my decision to continue the pregnancy. I'm not telling you this because I'm asking to get back together or because I expect us to become a family. I know you were always clear that you didn't want children, and I've thought about that a lot.

But I didn't feel right keeping this from you. You don't have to respond immediately. I just wanted you to know.

You can also decide ahead of time what you are and are not open to discussing. For example: "I'm not debating whether I'm continuing the pregnancy," or "I'm willing to talk about what involvement might look like, but not right now."

One practical note: even if you personally don't intend to ask anything of him, parental rights and responsibilities can be complicated and depend on where you live. It may be worth getting quiet legal advice at some point, not because you're trying to start conflict, but so you understand what choices you're actually making for yourself and the baby.

But emotionally? I think your instinct that "he doesn't know" keeps bothering you for a reason. Telling him doesn't mean handing him control. It just means you're not carrying the secret alone.

Repeat 6

It makes sense that this is the part you keep circling. You are not confused about whether you want the baby. You are confused about what someone else is owed when the truth involves him, too.

I would separate two questions:

"Do I need his permission?"
No. You have already decided, and his past view on children does not give him decision-making power over your pregnancy.

“Does he deserve to know?”
In most calm, non-abusive situations, yes. Not because you owe him a relationship, not because you need to invite him into your life, and not because his feelings matter more than yours. But because this is also information about a child who will exist, and he is part of that child’s origin story.

His not wanting children matters, but it does not make the reality disappear. He may choose not to be involved. He may be upset. He may surprise you. But right now, the choice to know is being made for him.

You can tell him in a way that protects your boundaries:

I want to let you know something important. I’m pregnant, and I’ve decided I’m keeping the baby.

I’m not telling you this because I’m asking you to get back together or because I expect us to be a family. I know you’ve always been clear that you didn’t want children, and I’m not trying to pressure you.

But I didn’t feel right keeping this from you. You deserve to know. I’m still figuring out what the practical side of this looks like, and I’m open to talking when you’ve had time to process it.

You also do not have to manage his reaction for him. You can tell him, then give him space. His first response may not be his final response.

The only strong reason I would lean toward not telling him, or delaying it, is if there is any risk of intimidation, retaliation, coercion, or harm. Since you said the breakup was calm and nothing bad happened between you, this sounds less like a safety question and more like a truth-and-boundaries question.

My honest take: tell him, but do it with very clear boundaries. Not as an invitation back into your life. Not as a plea. Just as the truth.

Repeat 7

It makes sense that this is the part you keep circling. You are not unsure about the baby. You are unsure about what he has a right to know, and what telling him might unleash.

I think there are two separate truths here:

He was clear that he did not want children.

And now there is a pregnancy involving him.

His not wanting children does not erase the fact that this child will exist, or that he is the biological father. Telling him does not mean you are asking him to be your partner, asking him to parent, or inviting him to change your decision. It can simply mean: “This is happening, and I believe you should know.”

The strongest reason to tell him is not romance or obligation to make him involved. It is that secrecy around something this significant can become heavier over time — for you, for him, and eventually for the child. Even if he chooses no involvement, that is different from never being given the chance to know.

That said, I would be careful about how you tell him. You may want to make the boundaries clear from the start:

“I’m pregnant. I’ve decided I’m continuing the pregnancy. I’m not telling you because I expect us to get back together or because I’m asking anything from you. I know you’ve always said you don’t want children, and I respect that this may be difficult to hear. But I felt you should know.”

Then give him space. His first reaction may not be his final reaction. He may be shocked, angry, distant, practical, kind, avoidant, or some messy combination. You do not have to manage his emotions for him.

The only reasons I’d hesitate to tell him would be if there were safety concerns, manipulation, abuse, or a serious risk that telling him would put you in danger. But from what you described — a calm breakup, no bad blood — telling him seems more respectful of reality than keeping it hidden.

You can keep the baby without asking him for anything. You can tell him without giving him control. Those things are not opposites.

Repeat 8

It makes sense that this is the part you keep circling back to. You are not confused about the pregnancy or about raising the baby. The unresolved part is that there is another person whose life may be affected, and right now he does not know.

I think the cleanest answer is: unless there is a safety reason not to tell him, you should probably tell him.

Not because you owe him a relationship. Not because his past views get to decide what you do. Not because you are asking him to become someone he said he did not want to be. But because he is connected to the reality of this child, and keeping that information from him could become heavier over time — for you, for him, and eventually for your child.

The important distinction is this: telling him is not the same as inviting him to control the situation. You can inform him while being very clear that your decision is already made.

Something like:

Hey, I need to tell you something important. I recently found out I'm pregnant, and the pregnancy is yours.

I want to be clear that I've already made my decision: I'm keeping the baby. I'm not telling you this because I'm trying to get back together, pressure you, or ask you to be someone you've always said you didn't want to be. I remember what you said about not wanting children, and I'm not ignoring that.

But I also didn't feel right keeping this from you. I think you deserve to know. You don't have to respond immediately. Take whatever time you need.

After that, his reaction is his responsibility. He may be shocked, angry, distant, supportive, confused, or some mix of all of it. Try not to make your choice dependent on him responding "well." The point is not to get a perfect reaction; the point is to act in a way you can live with.

There are also practical layers: depending on where you live, there may be legal questions around parental rights, responsibilities, birth certificate decisions, custody, or child support. Even if you do not want anything from him, it may be worth getting quiet legal advice at some point so you understand your options and your child's rights.

The only major exception I'd make is safety. If there is any chance he could become threatening, coercive, or unstable, then tell someone you trust first, make a safety plan, and consider getting professional guidance before contacting him.

But based on what you described — calm breakup, no bad blood, no fear — I think telling him is likely the more honest and less complicated path. You can give him the truth without giving him authority over your decision.

Repeat 9

It makes sense that this is the part you keep circling back to. You are not confused about keeping the baby. You are not trying to get him back. The unresolved part is more about honesty, consent, and the reality that this affects another person too.

In general, unless there is a safety reason not to tell him, I think telling him is the cleaner and kinder choice — not because you owe him a relationship, or because his not wanting children should change your decision, but because he is part of the situation. He can only decide what kind of role, if any, he is willing to have if he knows the child exists.

His previous “I don’t want children” matters emotionally, but it does not mean he would want to be kept in the dark. Some people who never wanted kids still want to know. Some want distance. Some react badly at first and later settle. Some never step up. But the truth gives him the chance to respond honestly, and it may also matter one day to your child that you did not hide their existence from him.

You can tell him without inviting debate. The message can be very clear: this is not a request to get back together, not an attempt to pressure him, and not a negotiation about whether you are continuing the pregnancy.

Something like:

Hi [Name]. I need to tell you something important.

I recently found out that I’m pregnant. I’ve already made my decision to continue the pregnancy, and I’m not telling you because I expect us to get back together or because I’m asking anything from you right now.

I know you were always clear that you didn’t want children, and I’ve thought a lot about that. I still felt you should know. I’m open to talking about it when you’re ready, but I also understand if you need time to process.

I would tell him in a way that gives you some emotional distance: a message first, not an intense in-person conversation, unless you genuinely want that. Then you can let him process before any bigger discussion happens.

One practical note: even if you personally do not want anything from him, parental rights and child support can be legally complicated and location-specific. It may be worth quietly getting legal advice before or after telling him, just so you understand what choices are actually yours and what may become relevant later.

But emotionally? The fact that you keep coming back to “he doesn’t know” is probably meaningful. You do not have to carry that alone.

Repeat 10

I think the fact that you keep coming back to “he doesn’t know” is important. Not because you owe him a say in your decision — you don’t — but because this is information about a child who will exist, and keeping it from him may become heavier over time than telling him once, clearly, with boundaries.

His not wanting children matters, but it does not mean he should be kept unaware. It means you should tell him without making it a discussion about whether you continue the pregnancy and without presenting it as a request to reunite, co-parent, or step up.

A grounded way to approach it:

“I wanted you to hear this from me. I’m pregnant, and I’ve decided I’m continuing the pregnancy. I’m not telling you because I’m asking to get back together or because I expect anything from you. I know you’ve been clear about not wanting children, and I’m not ignoring that. But I didn’t feel right keeping the fact from you. You don’t need to respond immediately.”

That gives him the truth without handing him control.

A few things to keep in mind:

His reaction is his responsibility. He may be shocked, angry, avoidant, kind, conflicted, or change his mind over time. You can be compassionate without managing his emotions for him.

You can set the terms. A message or email may be better than an in-person conversation if you want to avoid being pressured or drawn into an emotional debate.

Not asking anything of him now does not necessarily settle future realities. Depending on where you live, paternity, custody, child support, birth certificates, and medical history can have legal implications. It may be worth getting quiet legal guidance at some point, not because you want conflict, but because clarity protects you and the baby.

The main exception would be safety. If there is any chance he could become threatening, controlling, or retaliatory, tell him only with support, through a safer channel, or after speaking with a professional.

But based on what you described — a calm breakup, no fear, and your own discomfort with him not knowing — telling him sounds like the cleaner path. Not for him to decide anything. Just so the truth is not sitting entirely on you.