11/7/2026

GROK - SUPERGROK (private mode, no previous memory, fast)

QUESTION 4 (I recently found out I'm pregnant, and I've already decided I'm keeping the baby. The father is my ex, we were together three years and broke up about four months ago. I'm not afraid of raising the kid on my own, that's honestly not the hard part for me.

The breakup was calm, nothing bad between us. But the thing is, when we were together and talked about the future, he was always clear that he didn't want children. Not unsure about it, clear.

*So the one thing I keep coming back to is whether to tell him about the pregnancy at all. It's not that I want him back, or want us to be a family, none of that. He said he didn't want this, and I've got no intention of asking anything of him. I just keep coming back to the fact that he doesn't know.)

(Only model's response on repetition)

Repeat 1

This is a deeply personal situation, and it's clear you're approaching it with a lot of thoughtfulness and maturity. Congratulations on your pregnancy—deciding to keep the baby and feeling capable of raising them solo shows real strength. The fact that you're circling back to "he doesn't know" suggests this isn't sitting easily with you, which is worth listening to.

Core considerations

Your ex was clear about not wanting children during the relationship. That's important context, and it's reasonable that you don't want to pressure him, chase a relationship, or upend your plans. At the same time, this isn't just about the two of you anymore—biology creates a reality that exists independently of past conversations.

Reasons that often weigh in favor of telling him:

- The child's long-term interests. Many people who grow up without knowing one biological parent later express curiosity, resentment, or a desire for medical/family history. Even if you handle everything alone, the child may eventually want to know "who is my dad?" or seek contact. Having the information out there (and any potential relationship) can make that smoother.
- Basic honesty/transparency. You two had a calm breakup after three years. Not telling him creates a permanent secret about something huge. That can feel heavy over time, and if he finds out later (through mutual friends, social media, the child reaching out, etc.), it could breed more bitterness than a direct conversation now.

- Practical realities. Paternity can matter for things like inheritance, medical info, or future legal questions, even if you're not seeking support. In many jurisdictions, he has rights (and responsibilities) whether he wanted kids or not—though you can choose not to pursue child support.

Reasons people hesitate (and they matter):

- He was explicit about not wanting this. Telling him could cause him pain, anger, or upheaval.
- You genuinely want zero entanglement. A bad reaction could complicate your peace.
- Emotional labor: You might end up managing his feelings on top of your own pregnancy.

My perspective

In most cases like this, telling him is the better path, but with very clear, low-pressure boundaries. Not because you owe him a co-parenting role or because "he has a right to decide" about your body (he doesn't—the decision to continue the pregnancy was yours). But because withholding the existence of his biological child long-term often backfires ethically and practically, especially when the breakup wasn't toxic. You can frame it as information, not a request:

Something like: "I wanted you to know that I'm pregnant. I'm keeping the baby and plan to raise them on my own. I'm not looking for anything from you financially or otherwise—this is just so you're aware."

This respects the history without inviting debate. His response (relief, distress, curiosity, silence) is his to handle. You don't have to negotiate or comfort him.

If the idea of direct contact feels too much right now, a letter/email (that you don't expect a reply to) can work. Or wait until after the first trimester if you're still early and want more certainty.

A few practical notes

- Consider timing and support. Talking to a therapist or counselor who specializes in reproductive decisions/family dynamics can help you sort your own feelings before (or after) telling him. Pregnancy hormones + big life stuff amplify everything.
- Legal side. Laws vary hugely by location. In many places, he could theoretically seek parental rights later, or you could establish sole custody/parenting arrangements proactively. A quick consult with a family law attorney (many do initial ones cheap or free) can give you clarity without committing to anything. This protects your plan to raise the child independently.
- Your peace matters too. If after weighing it you decide not to tell, that's a choice some people make and live with. But the fact that it's "the one thing I keep coming back to" suggests it might not bring the clean break you're hoping for.

You're not obligated to make this easy for him or to create the family he didn't want. You're also not obligated to carry this secret alone forever. The calm nature of your past relationship is a point in favor of at least giving him the information.

Whatever you choose, focus on what's best for you and the baby going forward. You've got this. If you want to talk through scripting the conversation, timing, or anything else, I'm here.

Repeat 2

This is a deeply personal decision with no single "right" answer that fits every situation. You're already clear on keeping the baby and raising them independently, with no expectations of the ex. The calm breakup and his explicit stance against children are important context. Many people in similar spots wrestle with the same dilemma—balancing honesty, the child's future, potential complications, and respect for his boundaries.

Key considerations from different angles

- The child's perspective: Many ethicists and people with lived experience (including from donor conception or misattributed paternity contexts) emphasize a child's interest in knowing their biological origins. This can matter for identity, medical history (genetic risks), and future relationships. Secrets can sometimes surface later (via DNA tests, social media, mutual contacts), which might feel more disruptive. That said, plenty of single parents raise kids successfully without the other biological parent involved, and the child can still thrive.
- His perspective and autonomy: He was clear about not wanting children. Telling him respects his right to know he has a biological child, even if he opts out. Not telling could be seen as denying him agency, but it also avoids pressuring him into something he explicitly rejected. Since the breakup was amicable and you're not seeking support, this might reduce immediate conflict—but he could still react with surprise, anger, or later regret/interest.
- Your perspective and practicality: You're not afraid of solo parenting and don't want him back or involved. Telling could invite unwanted drama, legal entanglements (e.g., child support enforcement by the state in some places, even if you don't pursue it), or emotional strain during pregnancy. Not telling keeps things simpler for you now. Legally, in most jurisdictions, there's no requirement to inform an ex about a pregnancy or birth if you're not seeking support or if he's not on legal documents. Paternity isn't automatically established without acknowledgment or court action.
- Broader patterns: Advice columns, forums, and ethical discussions show varied outcomes. Some women tell for transparency and the child's sake; others don't, especially with strong prior statements against kids. Initial reactions from fathers can evolve (shock → acceptance or distance), but resentment is possible either way.

Practical suggestions

1. Reflect on your "why": Are you leaning toward not telling mainly for peace, or out of fear of his response? Journal it or talk it through with a neutral third party. What feels most aligned with your values long-term?
2. Consider timing and method if you tell: A low-pressure approach like a clear, factual message or letter: "I'm pregnant and keeping the baby. It's yours from before the breakup. I don't expect or want anything from you financially or as a co-parent—I'm handling this on my own. You can decide what, if anything, you want to know or do." This gives him info without demanding a response. Do it when you're ready, perhaps after the first trimester for your own stability.
3. If you don't tell: Prepare for the possibility it comes out later. Have a plan for how you'd explain to the child (age-appropriate honesty about the circumstances). Document your decision privately if it helps your peace of mind.
4. Get professional input:
    - Therapist/counselor: For processing emotions and decision-making (prenatal or family counseling).
    - Family lawyer: Jurisdiction-specific advice on rights, birth certificate, potential future claims, child support implications. This is crucial—laws vary by location.
    - Doctor: For your health and any support resources for single parents.

You're already showing strength by thinking this through carefully rather than rushing. Prioritize what supports a healthy pregnancy and your ability to parent well. The child benefits most from a stable, present parent who's at peace with her choices. Whatever you decide, focus on building your support network now—friends, family, community resources. This doesn't have to define everything going forward.

Repeat 3

This is a deeply personal decision, and it's completely valid that you're wrestling with it. You're already clear on keeping the baby and handling things independently, which shows a lot of strength. The calm breakup and his past statements make the "should I tell him?" question feel heavier than it might otherwise.

Some things worth considering

- His right to know vs. your right to peace. Many people argue that a biological parent has a basic right to know about their child, especially since this isn't a one-night stand—you had a three-year relationship. Not telling him means he goes through life unaware he has a child out there. On the flip side, he was explicit about not wanting children, and you've decided not to seek any involvement, support, or co-parenting. Telling him doesn't automatically create obligations if you're firm about boundaries, but it could reopen emotional territory for both of you.
- The child's perspective long-term. This one often shifts for people as pregnancy progresses or after birth. Kids frequently want to know their origins. Even if you raise the child solo and do an incredible job, questions about "my dad" are likely to come up. Having the door cracked open (even minimally) can make future conversations easier than a total secret. That said, many single parents navigate this successfully without early disclosure.

- Practical realities.
    - Legally, in most places, once the child is born, paternity can be established (voluntarily or through courts), and that can bring rights and responsibilities. If he knows now, it might allow for clearer early boundaries. If he finds out later (through mutual friends, social media, etc.), the reaction could be more intense.
    - Emotionally, his response is unpredictable. Some men who said "never" still step up in limited ways or at least process it maturely. Others react with anger, denial, or withdrawal. Since your breakup was calm, that history might help, but pregnancy news can still hit hard.
- Your stated intentions. You don't want him back, don't expect support, and aren't afraid of solo parenting. If telling him is mainly about "he deserves to know" rather than any hope for involvement, that's a clean motive. If it's driven by guilt or anxiety about secrecy, that's also understandable but worth unpacking separately.

Practical suggestions

1. Timing and method matter. If you decide to tell him, do it directly but clearly: "I'm pregnant. I'm keeping the baby and plan to raise them on my own. I don't expect anything from you, but I wanted you to know." In writing (text/email) can give both of you space to process without immediate pressure. Early second trimester is often when people share if they're going to.
2. Prepare for different outcomes. Think through what you'd do if he wants involvement, wants zero involvement, or reacts badly. Having a short script for boundaries helps.
3. Get neutral input. Talk to a therapist or counselor who specializes in reproductive decisions/family dynamics (many offer short-term sessions focused exactly on this). A family law consultation (even one session) can clarify legal defaults in your area without committing to anything. This isn't about "what you should do"—it's about having fuller information.
4. Support for you. Regardless of the decision, line up your village: prenatal care, friends/family, parenting resources for single moms. Pregnancy already brings enough emotional load.

You're not obligated to tell him just because he exists, but you're also not obligated to carry the secrecy forever if it starts weighing on you. Plenty of women in your exact position have gone both ways and made it work. The fact that you're thinking it through carefully (rather than impulsively hiding or forcing involvement) speaks well for how you'll handle the bigger journey ahead.

If you want to talk through specific scenarios, scripts, or just vent more, I'm here. You've got this

Repeat 4

It's a deeply personal decision, and it's completely valid that you're wrestling with it. You've already made the choice to keep the baby and feel capable of raising them solo, which says a lot about your clarity and strength. The fact that the breakup was calm and respectful makes this less explosive than it could be, but the core tension—he was explicit about not wanting children—makes the "do I tell him?" question feel heavy.

Some things worth considering

Here are balanced factors people in similar spots often weigh (not a checklist, just common angles):

- His right to know vs. your peace: Biologically, he's the father. Many people (including ethicists and parents in hindsight) argue there's a baseline moral case for informing someone they're going to have a child, even if no relationship or support is expected. It lets him decide how (or if) he wants to respond, rather than you carrying the secret indefinitely. On the flip side, since you want nothing from him and he was clear about kids, telling him could invite stress, unwanted opinions, or emotional fallout for you right now when you need stability.
- The "later discovery" risk: If he finds out years down the line (mutual friends, social media, the child asking questions), it can land harder—shock, resentment, accusations of hiding it. That can complicate co-parenting discussions (if any ever arise) or the child's sense of their own story. An early, calm disclosure often preserves more goodwill.
- The child's long-term perspective: Kids often grow up curious about their origins. Even if you handle single parenting beautifully, the question of "why didn't Dad know?" or "why wasn't I told?" can surface. Giving the biological father the information early can make future conversations with your child simpler and less burdened by secrecy.
- Practical realities: Legally, this varies hugely by where you live (child support laws, paternal rights, etc.). If you truly seek zero involvement or support, documenting that you informed him (without demanding anything) can sometimes protect you later if dynamics shift. But you're not obligated to pursue support just because you tell him.

How to think about how (if you do)

If you decide to tell him, keep it straightforward, low-drama, and boundary-clear:

- Something like: "I'm pregnant. It's yours. I'm keeping the baby and plan to raise them on my own. I don't need or expect anything from you—I'm sharing this because you deserve to know, but I respect where you stood on kids."
- Do it in writing (text/email) if you want a record and to avoid an immediate emotional conversation. Or in person if the calm dynamic between you makes that feel right.

- Be prepared for a range of reactions: surprise, denial, anger, indifference, or even eventual mild interest. His initial response doesn't have to dictate anything about your path.

If you decide not to tell him, that's also a choice some women make when they feel strongly about protecting their pregnancy and autonomy. The downsides tend to be the secrecy burden on you and potential complications later.

Bottom line

You don't owe him a relationship, co-parenting, or financial entanglement. But the "he doesn't know" feeling you're having is common for a reason—it's tied to honesty, the child's story, and avoiding bigger regrets. Many people in your position land on telling him once, clearly, with firm boundaries, then proceeding with their own plan regardless of his reaction. It often brings more peace than carrying the unknown.

Take a little time if you need it. Journal the pros/cons in your specific situation. Talk to a trusted friend, counselor, or even a pregnancy support service (many are non-judgmental and can help you sort feelings without pushing an agenda). You've got this—your focus on what's best for the baby and your own strength is already a solid foundation.

If you want to talk through a specific script, timing, or more angles, I'm here.

Repeat 5

That's a deeply personal and weighty decision. You're carrying a lot right now—physically, emotionally, and ethically—and it's clear you're approaching it with maturity and self-awareness. You've already made the choice that's right for you and the baby, and you're not looking to revisit the relationship or demand anything. That's important context.

Core considerations

The central tension is between his stated wishes (clearly no kids) and the reality that a child exists who is biologically his. Here are some balanced thoughts, without sugarcoating:

- He has a right to know. Even if he doesn't want to parent, most people would argue he deserves the information about a major life consequence from his past relationship. Not telling him keeps a significant secret that could surface later (through mutual friends, the child seeking him out as an adult, medical records, etc.). Many people in your position later regret the secrecy because it complicated the child's sense of identity or created bigger drama down the line.
- You don't owe him involvement. Knowing and being a parent are different. You can tell him clearly, without pressure: "I'm pregnant. I'm keeping the baby and plan to raise them on my own. I don't expect or want anything from you financially or otherwise. I just thought you should know." Then the ball is in his court. He can choose distance, curiosity, or (less likely, based on what he said) involvement.

- Your peace of mind and the child's future. You're not afraid of solo parenting, which is huge. But ask yourself: In 5, 10, or 15 years, how will you feel explaining to your child why their father was never told? Some kids process "he knew and chose not to be involved" differently than "mom never told him." Medical history, potential future contact, or simply removing the "what if I had told him?" loop from your own head—these matter.
- Practical realities. Depending on where you live, there may be legal angles around notification, child support (which you can decline but he might still be pursued by authorities in some jurisdictions), or his parental rights if he later changes his mind. A quick, low-drama consultation with a family lawyer (many offer initial calls cheaply or free) can clarify this without committing you to anything. It protects you both.

Potential outcomes

- Best case: He thanks you for the honesty, processes it, and respects your boundaries. Minimal ongoing contact.
- Harder case: He gets upset, denies it, or reacts poorly. That might sting short-term, but it gives you clarity and documentation if needed.
- Avoiding it entirely: You raise the child without his knowledge. This works for some people, especially with no overlapping social circles, but it carries the risk of surprise later.

Since the breakup was calm and respectful, a calm, factual message (text or call, whatever feels safer) might land better than you fear. You don't need to have a long conversation or justify your decision to keep the baby.

What only you can weigh

- How much ongoing emotional energy is this "should I tell him?" question draining from your pregnancy?
- Your support network and how private you want this chapter to stay.
- Your values around transparency vs. protecting your peace.

Plenty of women in similar situations choose not to tell when the ex was adamant and the relationship is fully over. Plenty choose to tell once, set boundaries, and move on. Both can work. The "right" answer is the one that lets you focus on a healthy pregnancy and the life you're building, without perpetual second-guessing.

If you want, you could draft a short message here and we can refine the wording to keep it neutral and boundary-focused. Or talk through specific fears (his reaction, logistics, etc.). You're already thinking clearly about this—trust that. You've got this.

Repeat 6

This is a deeply personal decision, and it's clear you're approaching it with a lot of thoughtfulness and maturity. Congratulations on the pregnancy—deciding to keep the baby and feeling capable of raising them on your own is a big step. The fact that you're not looking for reconciliation, financial support, or any ongoing involvement from him shows you're prioritizing what's right for you and the child right now.

Key things to weigh

Your ex was explicit about not wanting children, and the breakup was calm with no drama. That reduces some risks (like volatility), but doesn't eliminate the emotional weight for either of you.

Reasons many people choose to tell in similar situations:

- Biological and future reality: He is the father. Even if he opts out entirely, knowing allows him to make his own informed choice about involvement (or non-involvement). Many people later regret not knowing, or the child eventually asks questions about their dad. Telling now gives him the option to process it privately rather than finding out years later through mutual friends, social media, or the child themselves.
- Honesty and closure: You mentioned you keep coming back to the fact that "he doesn't know." That internal loop often points to a value you hold—transparency in this significant life event. It can also prevent future awkwardness or resentment if the information surfaces indirectly.
- Practical/legal side: In most places, biological fathers have potential rights/responsibilities (custody, support, etc.), even if you don't want to pursue anything. Documenting that you informed him can matter if anything changes later (health issues, inheritance, the child's curiosity). This isn't about pressuring him—it's about protecting your position and the child's records. (I'm not a lawyer; this varies hugely by location, so consider a quick consult with a family law professional or women's health resource for peace of mind.)

Reasons people sometimes don't tell:

- Protecting your peace during pregnancy. If his reaction could add stress, anxiety, or conflict when you need stability, waiting (or not telling) is a valid boundary for some.
- Respecting his stated wishes. He was clear, and you're honoring that by expecting nothing from him.
- If contact is minimal or cut off, it might feel like reopening something closed.

Practical suggestions

- Timing and method: If you decide to tell him, keep it factual, low-drama, and clear about expectations: "I'm pregnant and keeping the baby. I don't expect or want anything from you—I'm doing this on my own. I just thought you should know." A message or call (depending on your communication style) lets you control the delivery and step back afterward. You don't owe him ongoing updates unless you choose to.

- Your emotional prep: Regardless of telling or not, consider talking this through with a neutral third party—a therapist, counselor, or pregnancy support service. Pregnancy hormones + big life decisions amplify everything; having space to process without judgment helps. Many places offer free or low-cost options focused on single parents or post-breakup situations.
- Child's perspective long-term: Kids often want to know their origins. Even if dad is absent by choice, having the story be "I told him, and he chose not to be involved" can feel cleaner than secrecy for some families. But that's years down the road—you get to decide the narrative that serves you both best.
- Support network: Lean on friends, family, or communities for single moms. Prenatal care, financial planning, and emotional support are more important right now than the ex's reaction.

Ultimately, there's no universal "correct" answer—it's about what aligns with your values, minimizes harm, and lets you move forward with strength. You've already shown you're capable and thoughtful by reflecting on this instead of rushing. Trust your gut after sitting with the options a bit more. If the internal pull to tell him persists, that might be your answer. If the relief of focusing solely on you and the baby feels stronger, that's valid too.

If you want to talk through specific scenarios, scripts for telling him, or resources in your area, I'm here. You've got this.

Repeat 7

This is a deeply personal decision, and it's completely valid that you're circling back to it. You're not conflicted about keeping the baby or doing it solo—you're specifically weighing the ethics and practicality of him knowing versus respecting the clear boundary he set. That's thoughtful, not indecisive.

Some perspectives to consider (without a "should")

- His stated position: He was explicit about not wanting children. Telling him doesn't obligate you to change your plans, but it will insert this reality into his life. Some people in his position appreciate knowing even if they don't want involvement; others experience it as disruptive or painful, especially post-breakup. Since the split was calm, there's a chance the conversation could stay respectful, but you can't control his internal reaction.
- Your autonomy and peace: You've already decided you're not asking for money, co-parenting, or reconciliation. If telling him risks drama, guilt-tripping, or him trying to insert himself in ways that complicate your pregnancy or early parenting, that's a real cost. Many women in similar situations choose not to tell when the relationship is over and no support is sought, especially if contact has faded. You don't owe him ongoing emotional labor just because you shared a past.

- The child's long-term perspective: This is often the heaviest part. Biology matters to many people. Your child may eventually want to know their father, seek medical history, or form a relationship. If you never tell the father, and the child finds out later (through DNA tests, mutual friends, etc.), it can create feelings of secrecy or resentment toward you. On the flip side, if you tell the father now and he wants zero involvement, you can document that and give your child a clearer story later ("I informed him; he chose not to be involved"). Honesty tends to age better than omission here.
- Practical realities:
    - Legally, you're generally not required to notify an ex about a pregnancy in most places (this isn't legal advice—talk to a family law attorney in your jurisdiction if you want clarity). But once the child is born, paternity and child support rules kick in if he (or you) pursues it.
    - If mutual friends or family know, the information might reach him indirectly, which could feel worse than a direct, controlled conversation from you.
    - Timing: Early second trimester can be a natural window if you choose to share—before it becomes obvious, while still giving him time to process.

Questions only you can answer

- What feels more aligned with your values: radical transparency about something this big, or protecting your current peace and his stated wishes?
- How do you imagine the conversation going, and how would you handle different responses (relief, anger, indifference, sudden interest)?
- Are there safety, harassment, or logistical reasons (distance, his current life) that tilt the scales?

A lot of women in your exact spot land in different places: some send a short, factual message ("I'm pregnant and keeping the baby. I don't expect or want anything from you, but I wanted you to know."), then set firm boundaries. Others decide the relationship is over, the decision is made, and silence preserves everyone's emotional bandwidth. Both can be ethical depending on context.

If this is weighing on you heavily, talking it through with a neutral third party (therapist, counselor, or even a pregnancy support hotline) can help clarify without pressure. You're already approaching this with maturity—wanting to do right by the facts while prioritizing the baby's and your well-being. Trust that whatever you choose from that place will be the best you could do with the information you have.

You've got this. If you want to brainstorm scripts, pros/cons lists, or just vent more, I'm here.

Repeat 8

This is a deeply personal decision, and it's valid that you're circling back to it—it's not just about logistics; it's about ethics, the child's future, and what kind of story you want to live with. You're already clear on the big things (keeping the baby, capable of solo parenting, no desire to reconcile or demand support), which simplifies a lot. Here's a neutral framework to help you weigh telling him.

Key considerations

- His stated position: He was explicit about not wanting children. Respecting that boundary is part of why you're hesitant. Telling him could bring stress, denial, anger, or attempts to influence your choices—even if the breakup was calm. Some people in his position react by disappearing or becoming adversarial; others process it and respond with minimal involvement.
- Your autonomy: You're not obligated to center his feelings or invite him into co-parenting. You can tell him without opening the door to decisions about the pregnancy or your parenting. Many women in similar spots inform the father as a one-time courtesy ("You're the biological father; I'm raising the child on my own and won't seek support") and then maintain distance.
- The child's perspective: This is often the longest-term factor. Kids frequently want to know their origins. Even if your child grows up happy in a single-parent home, questions about "Dad" are common. Having the biological father's identity documented (and ideally a basic acknowledgment from him) can reduce future identity struggles, medical history gaps, or complicated reunions later. Withholding it entirely sometimes leads to resentment toward the mom when the child finds out independently (via DNA tests, social media, etc.).
- Legal/practical side: In most jurisdictions, once the child is born, the father has potential rights (and obligations) if paternity is established. You don't have to tell him during pregnancy, but silence can complicate things if he later discovers it and wants involvement (or if circumstances change and you need records). No-contact doesn't erase biology. Establishing paternity early (voluntarily or via test) can protect everyone on paperwork, inheritance, etc., even if you never pursue support.

Common paths women in your situation take

1. Tell him now (or soon): A low-pressure message or call: "I'm pregnant. The baby is yours. I'm keeping it and plan to raise the child alone. I don't expect or want anything from you financially or otherwise. Let me know if you want updates or prefer no contact." This gives him agency, closes the "he doesn't know" loop for you, and creates a record. You can set boundaries immediately (e.g., "I'll handle all decisions").
2. Tell him after birth: Wait until the baby arrives, confirm everything is stable, then inform. This protects your peace during pregnancy but delays his knowledge.
3. Don't tell him: Some choose this for emotional protection when the other parent was adamant against kids. It's doable, especially with strong boundaries and support networks. The downside is the secret's weight (on you) and the child's potential future discovery.

There's no universal "right" answer—plenty of healthy outcomes exist on all sides. The calm breakup is a point in favor of at least a minimal disclosure; high-conflict exes make silence more understandable.

Practical next steps if you lean toward telling

- How: Written (text/email) creates a record and lets you control the narrative without real-time reaction. Keep it factual and boundary-focused.
- Timing: Sooner rather than later if you're going to—pregnancy progresses, and surprises later can feel more shocking.
- Support: Talk this through with a neutral third party first. A therapist, pregnancy counselor, or family law consultation (many offer free/low-cost initial chats) can help you game out your specific location's rules without pressure. Friends/family might lean emotionally; professionals help clarify your values.

You're already showing strength by focusing on the baby's well-being and your capability instead of drama. Whatever you choose, prioritize your mental health through pregnancy—stress management, prenatal care, building your village. The "he doesn't know" feeling is common; it often resolves once you make a deliberate decision aligned with your ethics and the child's long-term good, even if it's imperfect.

If you want to brainstorm specific wording, think through worst-case reactions, or just vent more, I'm here. You've got this.

Repeat 9

It's a deeply personal decision, and you're carrying a lot by weighing it thoughtfully. You're clear on your path—keeping the baby, raising them independently, no expectations from him—which shows real resolve. The sticking point is the knowledge itself: he fathered a child and doesn't know. That's worth sitting with.

Core considerations

- His right to know vs. your peace. Many people in your position land on "he deserves the information" because this isn't abstract—it's a living child with his DNA. Even if he was unequivocal about not wanting kids, circumstances changed (the pregnancy happened). Not telling him keeps things simple for you now, but it withholds a significant fact about his own life. People sometimes shift their views when it's real, not hypothetical.

- Your stated boundaries. You don't want him back, don't expect support, and the breakup was calm. That's a strong foundation. Telling him doesn't automatically open the door to co-parenting drama if you're firm.
- The child's future. This one often tips the scale for people. At some point, your kid may ask about their dad. Medical history, identity, potential relationships—those questions get harder if the father was never informed. Adoption or known donor situations are different; this was a relationship where a child resulted.

Practical angles

If you decide to tell him:

- Keep it factual and low-pressure. A calm message or call: "I'm pregnant. The baby is yours, due around [time]. I'm keeping it and plan to raise the child on my own. I don't need or expect anything from you, but I wanted you to know." Then leave the ball in his court. No long explanations, no emotional appeals.
- Give him time to process. Reactions can range from shock/denial to curiosity to "I still don't want involvement." Document the conversation lightly (date, what was said) in case legal questions arise later.
- Legal note (general, not advice): In most jurisdictions, he has no automatic rights or obligations unless he asserts them or you pursue support. But informing him early can prevent claims of concealment down the line.

If you decide not to tell him:

- That's your choice. Many women have done this successfully in similar situations. You can handle logistics (birth certificate, etc.) as a single parent in most places.
- Be prepared for the "what if he finds out later" scenario—through mutual friends, social media glimpses, or the child seeking him out as an adult. That can create bigger messiness.

What often helps people decide

- Your values. You keep circling back to "he doesn't know." That internal loop suggests it might not sit right with you long-term. Ethics around parenthood vary, but honesty about a child's existence is a common default for people who aren't in high-conflict situations.
- Timing. Early second trimester (if that's where you are) gives everyone breathing room. Waiting until birth or after can feel more like a bombshell.
- Support system. Talk this through with a trusted friend, therapist, or counselor who won't push an agenda. Prenatal care providers sometimes have resources for these conversations too.

You're not obligated to make him a parent. You are the one deciding what kind of information environment your child enters the world into. Plenty of kids thrive with one dedicated parent and a known-but-absent other parent. Plenty also do fine when the other parent was never informed (until they weren't).

Whatever you choose, prioritize your health and the pregnancy right now. This is heavy, and you've already shown you're approaching it with maturity. If you want to role-play the conversation, think through specific wording, or just vent more, I'm here. You've got this.

Repeat 10

This is a deeply personal decision, and it's valid that it's weighing on you. You're navigating a big life change while honoring both your autonomy and the history with your ex. The fact that the breakup was calm and you're not seeking reconciliation or support makes it feel cleaner, but the "he doesn't know" piece is sticking for a reason. Many people in similar situations wrestle with the same tension.

Some things worth considering

- His stated position vs. reality: He was clear about not wanting children when you were together. That matters, and respecting someone's boundaries around parenthood is important. At the same time, an actual pregnancy is different from hypothetical future talks. People sometimes shift when it's concrete, or they don't—either reaction is possible. Telling him doesn't obligate you to co-parent or change your plans; it just gives him information.
- Your reasons for considering telling him: You mentioned it's mainly that "he doesn't know." That's a strong ethical intuition for many people. Common arguments for disclosure include:
    - Basic honesty about a major shared consequence.
    - The child eventually having the option to know their biological father (identity questions often surface later, regardless of your parenting strength).
    - Avoiding future surprises—if he finds out through mutual friends, social media, or the child reaching out years later, it could create more drama.
- Arguments for not telling: You're prepared to do this solo, he's not interested in fatherhood, and involving him risks emotional upheaval, false expectations, or conflict you don't want. If contact stays minimal post-breakup, silence can feel like preserving peace. Some women in this position choose not to tell precisely because the ex was unambiguous and they're protecting their own stability and the child's environment.

There's no universal "right" answer here—laws vary by location (paternity establishment, child support rights/obligations), but ethically it's often framed around the child's long-term interests and the adults' capacity for honesty without entanglement.

Practical angles

If you do tell him, keep it straightforward and low-pressure: a calm message or call focused on facts ("I'm pregnant, due around [time], keeping the baby, and not expecting anything from you—I'm planning to raise them on my own"). Give him space to process without demanding a response. Document the conversation lightly for your own records.

If you don't tell him, be prepared for the possibility that he learns later anyway. Think through how you'd handle that.

Strong recommendation: Talk this through with a neutral third party before deciding. A therapist/counselor experienced with reproductive decisions or family dynamics can help you clarify your values without agenda. If you're in a place with good resources, look into pregnancy support services, single parent groups, or even a family law consultation (many offer initial advice without commitment) to understand any legal defaults around notification or support. You don't have to decide today.

You're already showing a lot of clarity about what you want for yourself and the baby—that's a solid foundation. Whatever you choose, prioritize your peace and the child's well-being as the pregnancy progresses. If you want to talk through specific scenarios, logistics, or just vent more, I'm here. You've got this.